The long-awaited sequel to Oblivion: Ad Magnificum Volumina is here! Humanity has lost its way and is nearly extinct. But for a lone survivor from the European disaster 500 years before, the Titans are the only people left alive in the Solar System. A rugged group of scrappy survivors of the Ripping, the Titans have fallen prey to humanity's baser instincts for survival, power and desperate need. The Three Regions, Shangri-La, Kraken Mare and Xanadu have succumbed to war at the hands of a megalomaniacal dictator bent on enslaving them all, Cassius Boll. His bent on world domination throws what's left of civilization into darkness where faith and hope for a bright future grows darker every moment. But two survivors of the onslaught, Grace Blieth Dubh and Manann mac Lir, leaders in exile of the defeated, unlike in every way, run for their lives across the tholin-dunes and methane rivers and lakes of Shangri-La to find refuge in a place only known in a children's story that history has long forgotten. Along the way, they find strength in each other, faith in the future, and appreciation for the strength of human character, while learning how the sacrifices of the past will meet in the present to light a candle of hope for the future.

is strong and compelling, and the vast landscapes are beautifully drawn and add(s) a superior sequel that could easily be read and enjoyed as a standalone too. (K.C. Finn for Readers' Favorite)
